Conflict happens.
It may be inner conflict.
It might be at home, in your organization, or out in the community.
Some days, you may handle things really well.
Other days, they go less than wonderful.
You are not alone.
I can relate. I am still practicing myself.
I work with folks facing bias and discrimination issues in the workplace, figuring out who will care for aging parents, and a myriad in between.
Peace takes practice. It goes beyond "walking on eggs shells" and avoiding conversations.
True peace honors both inner and outer peace.
You hold value and values.
So do the folks around you.
It might involve clarity, freedom, or respect.
It may be about appreciation, purpose, or support.
Practicing as a civil and family attorney for twenty years, and now as a mediator, I see the tremendous amount of time, money, and emotional energy exhausted in avoiding and litigating conflicts.
Overlooking conflict takes a similar toll on business, family and organization morale, productivity, and of course, relationships.
Addressing issues allows you to focus on the vision.
You do not have to do this alone.
Let me help.

"I felt like Sherry was speaking directly to me. I walked away feeling hopeful and changed. She convinced me that the future is now and I have the power to own it! "
~ Carol W.

“As a service-oriented business, it is imperative the needs of my clients come first without detriment to the business. Sherry has a unique way of helping one see from different perspectives, of wording responses so that others’ needs are heard and met and of keeping the conversation continuing until both parties feel an adequate resolution.”
~ Melissa O.
